Arca: Noises from Biology Without a Body

Aldo Poblete Varas
24 November 2026

Outside the parameter, still within the horizon of strange terrain. Mineral greens, dead browns, primary strata that disdain the empire of evil stalking us, for we are already silicon nature, the sheer novelty of the technical world. A denatured Kittler. A fiction of incongruous materials and libidinal infamy, salvaged from some lost site in the laboratory where machines manufacture renewed certainties, drifts in the pond where a civilization's dreams rot. Inside that peculiar dream, the body affects itself. Arca arrives after this end of time has been announced far too early. The melody of an exhausted prelude, a canvas primed until nothing can adhere to it. Preparation replaces primary execution. Transit becomes the path. The verb steps outside profit, reduced to clamor and a stale transhumanist declaration of victory.

We spell it out and pardon our aristocratic sins while the density of the human condition quietly disfigures itself. The human becomes a strange convergence of alibis, unfolding across a reality governed by numbers, raw matter, and affects we swallow out of convenience and sheer boredom with the cultural forms that once summoned the sea. Through Arca, that tedium ruptures. Darkness turns into a vital liquid and destroys domesticated sensoriality. Here it rises from the earth as sacred rain, a gloom capable of fracturing whatever still stands with its back turned to the labyrinth of a self-speculating society. Capital and mystical delirium hover over drifting drum machines and synthesizers as they emit sound-generating algorithms. Beneath pitch-shifted vocal fractures and collapsing metallic percussion, everything remains submerged in the LCL that sustains life and enables connection. The cable enters the spinal cord directly, prying the torso open until the organs, or whatever remains of them, lie exposed.

This is the music of a cold, deliberate intentionality. A hieratic sigh before the strict mechanics of an extropian drive toward the ecstasy of exposed organs. Luciferian manipulation of limits. At the doors of these speculative caverns, salvation and critique fall away. Inside, music and time are lost in infinitesimal calculus and computer casings awaiting total rupture. Not another proxy conflict from which contemporary art can politely detach itself and withdraw its existential forces. Only from that threshold can you account for the blacks of this room. Glossy blacks, libraries of permitted dreams fed by kaleidoscopic alien textures across a territory inscribed with a universal history of crime. From Mutant through the Kick cycle, this is music of the body, where confinement turns into a poem of frenzy, a feverish dialogue among overdriven senses.

In Arca's music, the fault line runs between a malefic biology conspiring against intelligence and the remnants of a phantasmagoric force that refuses to reinvent itself in letters and concepts. Delirium is already pure digital diagram. Every organism is at once biological residue specialized in automatic reproduction and the entire mirage of reckoning produced by the most sinister machine visions. It passes through diseases bleeding out of the pixel, through marginal fantasy and the forensic spectacle of subjects anchored to a terrain where prestige and biology wait with their backs turned, ready to be dragged to the curtain. There, funerary remains cannot rest without the concrete destroying itself. Sonority recedes until nothing survives of it except total subordination to the spectacle of bodily remains, like a red, magnetic moon trapped inside the chip. On that runway, Galliano can still pass through, leaving the obsidian mask sealed inside the rooms built to contain it.

Arca at the edge of the syntagm. A religion for an era of beginnings: a viscous noise issuing from the origin of time, coagulated to boil over today.